

What's your point of passion?

Contributed by John Alanis

Did you know women love a man with a point of passion?

Hey Guys,

I recently talked to a female friend of mine, stationed overseas at a diplomatic post. She told me about a guy she was attracted to, a guy who was not really handsome, certainly not rich, and not even from the US.

Why was she so attracted to this guy? Because he was very, very passionate about his work and his writing. So passionate in fact, he risks arrest and incarceration for writing about what he believes in (not in the US, but in his home country).

This "point of passion" is a very attractive trait in a man. Women love men who have something in their life meaningful to them, something they are excited about, passionate about, and driven to accomplish.

Why is this so attractive? Several reasons. First off, if he is passionate about something, that means he can be passionate about her, and that's one thing very important to a woman--her man is passionate about her.

Secondly, it lets her know she's not his only reason for being. A man who focuses on nothing but the woman in his life is unattractive because it shows he doesn't have much going on.

Thirdly, if he's driven, it shows he's success oriented, interested in creating a great life, not the dull and boring one most men lead.

Oddly, it doesn't matter what you're passionate about, just that you're passionate about something. Men who are passionate about business are just as attractive to women as men who are, say passionate about music, art, etc. It's the point of passion that counts.

There is, of course, as caveat, and that's this: women are not interested in men so passionate about something they lose interest in them. Passion for something must be balanced with time spent with her, and passion for her--that's the real key.

So, find your point of passion and feature it to women--it will make you an attractive man.

On with the fun...
